The people are of first importance and so it may seem strange that the illustrations are of places. As one of the characters in A Lovely View of the Gasworks says, "It doesn't matter what's outside; it's what's inside 'at counts'". But the decision was a deliberate one. The pictures set the background to the stories: the people are left to speak for themselves, for they do so effectively and their stories repay thoughtful reading. In the follow-up work at the end of this book there are several suggestions for your own writing. (These are marked with an asterisk*.) As you read these stories we think you will realise how many stories of your own are possible. Barstow is an encouraging writer. He writes (and you are likely to find this a good example) about what he knows-in his case working-class life in the North of England. He makes you more alert to how much there is interesting and moving in the everyday lives of ordinary people. His style-the details of observation, the dialogue, the awareness of people's reactions-helps you to see how a character and his story can be brought convincingly to life. 180 pp. Englisch.
