Excerpt: . . . a religious man is tolerant, it evinces that he is religious from thought and enquiry, because he exhibits in his conduct one of the most beautif ful and important consequences of. a religious mind, an inviolable charity to all the honest varieties of human opinion. I 3Lord Sidmouth, and all the anti-catholic people, little foresee that they will hereafter be in the sport of the antiquarian; that their prophecies of ruin, and destruction from Catholic emancipation will be clapped into the notes of some quaint history, and be matter of pleasantry even to the sedulous housewife, and the rural dean. There is always a copious supply of Lord Sidmouths in this world; nor is, there one single source of human happiness, against which they have not, uttered-the most lugubrious predictions. Turn. pike roads, navigable canals, inoculation, hops, tobacco, the reformation, the revolution, --there are always a set of worthy, and moderately gifted men, who bawl out death, and ruin upon every valuable change, which the varying; aspect of human affairs absolutely, and imperiously requires. I have often thought that it would be extremely useful to make a collection of the hatred, and which are now admitted to be marked improvements in human affairs. in Such an history, might H. make folly a little more modest, and suspicious of its own decisions. Ireland, you say, since the Union, is to be considered as a part of the whole kingdom ; and in therefore, however...
